Mentorship Program

Background

Mentoring programs offer benefits to both students and their mentors. Typically mentorships involve meeting with a student over lunch or coffee, and communicating periodically via phone or email.

For students, the primary benefit from a mentorship is the opportunity for a candid give and take about life in the real world, not only about the requirements of a particular job, but also the ups and downs encountered in getting a job done. Getting a better feel for a profession is important to students, who may have an idealized view of what they would like to do with their lives but very little idea of what it takes to get the job done day after day.

Mentorships differ from internships in that mentors can share what really goes on behind the scenes, the stresses and strains of working on a project and the satisfaction of seeing it to completion, outside of a formal working relationship. The more students know about what is not always obvious about an occupation, the more likely it is that they will make a proper judgment about whether the career is right for them.

In addition, building and maintaining a relationship with a mentor extends well beyond graduation as a starting place for building a professional network, and as a trusted advisor when career guidance is needed.

For the professional, mentoring provides an opportunity to share passion about their work. By opening up a conversation with someone not familiar with their work, the mentor continually develops essential communication skills. Interacting with students interested in their profession can also help mentors stay ahead of peers as university programs keep abreast of the latest trends in all fields of instruction. Mentors also develop relationships with those learning skills that are valued by their firms and that are in high demand.

Student Enrollment Projections and Commitments

The goal is to provide every student enrolled in the program with an off-campus mentor who works in the field.
